

State of Alaska

Department of Public Safety

Division of

Alaska State Troopers

Sean Parnell, Governor
Joseph Masters, Commissioner

April 23, 2010

Letter of Appreciation

German Shepherds were bred for intelligence to protect sheep flocks from predators. They are revered for their loyalty and renowned to be sensitive to people's emotions. While a collie named Lassie may be best known as a dog hero for the saying "Lassie, go get help," Buddy carried on the tradition set by German Shepherds Strongheart and Rin Tin Tin when he went to get help after his owners' property caught on fire on April 4, 2010.

Like usual, Buddy was beside his human companion, Ben, who was working in the family's shop that day. A heater ignited chemicals the Ben was working with, giving him flash burns to his face. The flames quickly grew as Ben escaped the shop. However, Buddy was briefly entrapped inside the burning shed when Ben shut the shop door behind him to keep the flames from spreading. After extinguishing the flames on his body, Ben immediately realized his dog was still inside the shed and went back in to let Buddy out. After Buddy exited the shed, Ben said to him, "Buddy, we need to get help."

Immediately Buddy headed to the woods, but not to hide as his owners expected the shy dog to do. Instead he ran to Caswell Loop Road where he eventually found help.

Alaska State Trooper Terrence Shanigan was struggling to find the fire in the Caswell Lakes area outside Willow, which has approximately 75 miles of roads. He had just received a frantic phone message calling for help left by neighbors of the Heinrichs who are members of the local neighborhood watch program. Shanigan's global positioning device froze up on him and dispatch was trying to pinpoint the address among the maze of back roads in the neighborhood. He was planning on taking a turn that would send him the long way around the neighborhood when Buddy appeared as a shadow at the edge of Shanigan's moose lights on his patrol vehicle. When Shanigan approached the intersection, the dog looked at him, and took off running down a side road. Shanigan acted on a hunch that the loose dog was there for a purpose and followed the running dog through three turns to the Heinrichs' property. Every once in a while during the run back to his home, Buddy looked back at Shanigan's vehicle as if to make sure the trooper was following. By the time Shanigan reached the property, the work shop was fully engulfed in flames that lapped precariously close to the Heinrichs' house.

Shanigan said Buddy stopped at the end of the driveway and turned around to wait for him. When Shanigan got out of his parked car, the dog ran around the patrol vehicle and approached him, jumped up and down and nudged him as he walked up the driveway toward the burning building.

Shanigan was able to verbally guide engines from area volunteer fire departments to the property. The work shed and the equipment that was stored inside were destroyed and a nearby wood shed was badly burned. However, the Heinrichs' home escaped the flames. Only the trim around the kitchen window was damaged by the fire.

Buddy's valiant actions saved Trooper Shanigan valuable time in responding to the fire. This award is in appreciation of Buddy's diligence and assistance to the Alaska State Troopers. Buddy's pluckiness is a bright spot among an otherwise tragic event for the Heinrichs family.

Sincerely,

Col. Audie Holloway
Director, Alaska State Troopers

"Public Safety through Public Service"
Office of the Director

5700 East Tudor Road - Anchorage, AK 99507 - Phone (907) 269-5511 - Fax (907) 337-2059