EXCLUSIONARY RULE REQUIRES EVIDENCE TO BE SUPPRESSED WHEN OBTAINED FROM ILLEGALLY SEIZED PASSENGER

Reference: I

Donald L. Castle

ν.

State of Alaska

Alaska Court of Appeals

Opinion No. 1670

P.2d

May 5, 2000

FACTS:

A police officer stopped a vehicle because one of its headlights was out. The driver, Michael Browning, who was driving with a suspended license, was arrested. Castle, the passenger, got out of the car and said, "I need to leave." The officer said, "Hold on--why don't you have a seat in the car? I'll be right back with you." After securing Browning in the patrol car, the officer noticed that Castle had departed the area.

A short time later, the officer discovered Castle walking along the street. He pulled his patrol car alongside Castle and stated, "Sir, I need to talk to you for just a moment." Castle started running away. He got into the street and ran in front of the patrol car. The officer activated his overhead lights and gave chase. After about three blocks and a subsequent struggle, the officer was able to subdue and handcuff Castle. Frisking revealed no weapons, but some cocaine was found during a later search at the police car.

Castle argued that his seizure was illegal and evidence should be suppressed. The State offered three theories by which the seizure and subsequent search of Castle was justified: (1) Castle was a witness to Browning's arrest; (2) Castle's sudden exit from the car caused the officer to fear that Castle might assault him; and (3) Castle committed a crime by running into the middle of the street.

ISSUE:

During a routine traffic stop, when there are no circumstances to justify an investigative stop of the passenger, does the police officer have authority to order a passenger to remain in the car and not leave the scene? (emphasis added)

HELD: No.

REASONING:

- 1. When a police officer instructs a person to sit in a patrol car, the officer "seizes" that person.
- $\underline{2.}$ It is clear that no exigency supported the officer's decision to detain Castle as a witness to a crime; the officer himself had personally observed the offense.
- 3. There is nothing in the record to support the assertion that Castle had presented an "officer safety" problem. By leaving the scene of the traffic stop, Castle "was trying to put as much distance as possible between himself and the officer."
- $\underline{4.}$ Even if Castle broke the law (municipal ordinance) by running into the middle of the street, his conduct was the direct result of the officer's unjustified attempt to seize him.
- 5. The record does not support the State's argument that Castle could be temporarily detained at the scene of the traffic stop, either because he was a witness to a crime or because he posed a potential threat to officer safety.

NOTES:

Consent was not an issue in this case because the officer did not ask Castle for (1) his consent to remain at the scene, and/or (2) permission to search his person. Likewise, the officer did not articulate any reasons (furtive movements, etc.) as to why he felt justified in making a search for his own safety.
